

Pull on the gloves, scope out the new line. The crew fires up their engines.

Nice finished tread down the slope. Working with an experienced crew is always good.

These two slugged it out on one of tougher sections. This area was frozen solid last December.

Boom, done. Nice wide, level trail. A LOT of rock was pulled out to level the tread here.

Tread and backslope cut last December are polished. Much colder then so we just hurried through it.

This tread polishing was considerably more violent. Where did all these roots come from?

The crew cuts new tread toward the lower connection. The bypassed user trail is in the background.

The crew works their way towards the bottom of the canyon. The gambel oak is thriving this spring.

With one big rock removed, the crew debates whether the next one needs to come out too.

Finished sustainable trail winds through the trees.

After a good trail session, the crew heads back to the barn.

The strawberry hedgehog are blooming all over (pic by Berman).

The bright perky sues are everywhere, loving the unusually wet spring.

Clumps of verbena poke through the slash, enjoying the mastication results (pic by Sharp).

No, this wasn't a flower walk. But we couldn't help notice the thistles in bloom at this elevation.

The views are gorgeous. Maybe another reason the crew is willing to put in the hard work...
