

The crew gathers to hear the safety brief and the plan of the day.

We hiked out to the end of the old trail section and obliterated on the way back.

After: deadfall hauled in to block the old trail.

A steep rocky turn in the old trail will be further reclaimed by nature.

We haven't seen Parry's bellflower lower down in the CATIP.

The boss told the crew to use the big stuff in this section. Yes sir, boss!

Big decomposing deadfall everywhere was the rule of the day.

Available obliteration debris was scarce in some areas, overwhelming elsewhere.

Once the old trail was obliterated, it was tough picking our way out.

The FOSM power pole saw was used to clear the upper reaches of the trail corridor.

Randomized obliteration has completely erased the old trail, blending it with the surroundings.

We found the western wallflower is a bright orange at this elevation.
