

Whoa! A local trail user is anxious for us to get started.

Heads down, the boys are getting with the program. Hard work, but in a beautiful location...

Grooming the backslope and clearing duff. Many compliments received from hikers passing through.

The Boulder Boys coax a limestone slab out of a tight section of trail.

Done! The slab is pushed off to the the right and the trail finishers start to plow their way through.

Coral bells and ferns cling to a limestone outcrop.

Trail finishing progresses back towards the start of the reroute. Nice having the seasonal crew along.

The Boulder Boys found another rock project. The concern was traffic erosion below the outcrop.

Almost there. You can take a turn with the rock bar now...

Time to move on after cutting down the top of the outcrop.

The mountain is drying out. Below the duff, the mineral earth was very dusty.

Another limestone outcrop. Everyone is salivating for a turn: what is so fun about breaking rocks?

Boom, done! The narrow section is widened, producing a clear tread line.

Richardson's geraniums were blooming along sections of the trail.
